Is it fair for insurance companies to deny health coverage to women with breast cancer, diabetes or asthma? Or to cancel our policies when we get sick? Should insurance companies be allowed to charge women more than men?

These practices are outrageous. Fortunately, they would be banned by health reform proposals moving forward in Congress. Both the Senate and House health reform bills would end the insurance practices of denying coverage for people with pre-existing conditions like cancer and rescinding people's coverage with they get sick. These bills would also ban the practice of charging women more than men for health insurance.

Insurance companies have far too much control over our health care and our lives. Let's make them play fair!
